

100 Best Point Guards

The point guard has replaced the big guy in the low post as the dominant figure in the game of basketball over the past quarter-century.

Dr. James Naismith, who invented the game of basketball, always said that it was the defense, not the offense, that established the pace of the game. And, so, over the past quarter-century, elite defenses have vastly increased the pressure, which in turn requires everybody to play faster. Against an elite defense, if you don't have an elite ball-handler, you have no chance. And, so, into the breach has stepped the modern point guard, aptly referred to as "the 1." He handles the ball, he protects the ball, he distributes the ball to his teammates in spots where they can score. And because he's probably the best athlete on the floor, of course he can score, too. But, score or not, his biggest value is his ability to protect the ball and get his team into its offense.

The real question about ranking the guards is what to do with some of the old-timers. Today you've got your "1" and your "2," your ball-handler and your shooter. In the old days there were guards who did neither. They played defense. They guarded people. We've decided to list the old-time defensive specialist as a "1."

The practical aspect is that, if an old-time team had a guard who could score, you can pick him out because of his point totals. It's harder to tell a ball-handler from a defender from the box scores and other available information. So, where the old-timers are concerned, we've just lumped them together, unless they were scorers, which was pretty rare. The other point is that for many—especially the ball-control, defensively-oriented coaches—your very best athletes played defense, not offense. They were "the 1s" of their day. So, that's where we put them, too, at "the 1."
